PART F: Read the text below and answer the questions.

1. Newspaper and television reports around the world show Africa as a continent with many problems. They focus on the wars, the starving children, the terrible diseases, and the natural disasters. Other, more positive aspects of life in Africa are rarely shown.

2. There are, indeed, serious problems in many parts of Africa. The biggest problem facing Africans today is the continuing threat of wars. These wars are in part due to historic competition among tribes. However, in the past, the fighting was local and small scale. In recent years, it has become more violent and devastating. This is partly because of the destructive power of modern weapons. It is also because the situation has changed dramatically.

3. Starting in the sixteenth century, European powers began to move into Africa. They took African people to sell as slaves in North and South America. They also took any valuable resource they could find, such as ivory, gold and diamonds. In the nineteenth century, the European rulers divided up the continent into countries. They did not understand much about African tribal traditions, and so the borders of these countries did not match the traditional borders of tribal lands.

4. When the countries of Africa became independent in the twentieth century, there were often several different tribes in a country, and each tribe wanted to rule. The result was conflict and civil war. In many countries, the civil wars have been going on for decades as different groups fight for control of the government. Governing means having not only power, but also having access to wealth - and one of the ways out of a life of poverty. In recent years, it has also meant having control over international aid and, therefore, access to food in times of starvation.

5. Many of the problems facing Africa today have been worsened by this fighting over control of the government. Countries that are at war have little time or resources to deal with poverty, hunger, or disease. They are unable to take any measures for a better future, and so many countries are becoming poorer and their problems are growing. For example, HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, has spread rapidly in Africa because of the lack of education and health care, as well as the lack of medical supplies. Other diseases, many preventable, have spread quickly for the same reasons.

6. In spite of these problems, however, many Africans are hopeful about their future. Ordinary people in many countries are joining together to change and improve their lives. Young and talented Africans are looking out to the rest of the world. They are experimenting with ways to use the Internet and other new technology to try to solve some of their problems. In the arts, and especially in music, many talented performers are showing the world what it means to be African.

- a. modern weapons can cause more and more harm
- b. of the lack of education and health care in general
- c. there has been an increase in natural disasters in the country recently
- d. people cannot benefit from the natural resources of the country

18. In many countries, different groups are fighting for control over the government so they can _____.

- a. prevent the spread of the HIV virus in their tribes
- b. get rid of the violence by European rulers
- c. become richer and control food supplies
- d. change the borders in some parts of the country

19. We can infer from the passage that international aid _____.

- a. can help prevent severe fighting between tribes
- b. might not be helpful in treatment of AIDS
- c. usually has no effect on the wars between groups
- d. may sometimes be a reason for fighting

20. According to the passage, there is a close connection between _____.

- a. access to wealth and level of education
